How to act when I have taught a student for an exam and come to know that he/she has spoken more than his/her voice ability? A: The issue of speaking more than you can do is not uncommon. There are a couple of responses that I have been successful with: Asking them to keep down their speaking and letting you know when they get out of control. This is the most effective method if their talking occurs close to you. For example when they were talking closely to you while on a phone line during the exam. Write down the rules. They need to know what the rules are and write them down. For example: Allow me to be very quiet and will speak only when it is my turn. Allow me to speak only during the exam. Allow me to speak once only and in small bursts. Ask me to speak in a normal tone and not to be very
